Low battery wallpaper android

Google back version 2.1, the first venerable Nexus One came out Android way added live wallpapers. Back then, it was little more than a curiosity, it was something other than a trick. Most live wallpapers guzzled battery life and were completely flamboyant to move behind very icons. Four years later, live wallpapers have become something to make your phone feel alive and personal, without obvious drawbacks. Let's look at live live wallpapers as comfortably as they do in their eyes. Muzei this live wallpaper is a new arrival in the Play Store, and many other apps in this category don't work slightly differently. Muzei (a translation of the Russian word музей, meaning museum) shoots beautiful high-resolution images and rotates them as backgrounds. The live part of the wallpaper comes in the same way that the home screen applies dim and blur filters that prevent it from being too busy, but you can double-tap it at any time to see the blurry image for a few seconds. Perhaps the best thing about Muzei is the amazing ecosystem of extensions that add new resources of images. There's always something new about Muzei. It is completely free on Google Play. Special Beam Phase Beam live wallpaper ice cream sandwich since Android's structures are included. It's easy on the battery and doesn't get a lot of icons in the way, but it's a bit boring, and it completely lacks options. A good alternative allows you to produce the same effect of Special Beam, but all kinds of tweak variables. If you don't like the blue/purple default view, you can replace it with what you want. Includes settings for custom Glow animation speed, lens glow effects shape, and even color gradient angle. It may also change as a niche reminder that it's time to install it, depending on your battery status. Basic color change features are included for free, but it will cost $1.49 to unlock everything. Mountains Now Google Now is at the heart of Google's Android plans, and its art style seems to be common in everything Google does. Mountains Now live wallpaper, imagine how this cute little Google Now title image will come to life and take over the home screen. The result, as you can imagine, is beautiful. Small ships float, mountains appear in the foreground, and clouds drift correctly as your perspective changes. The real lethal feature in Mountains Now is that the phone can use your device's gyroscope to produce a parallax effect when moved. Even the animation speed and movements came. I never see Mountains Now show on my battery monitor. Clean lines and solid colors also don't get in front of your icons. The full app costs $1.63, but has a free version with a subset of features. Wave live wallpaper is definitely a bit like this Special Beam overflowing with settings. This produces an array waves and wavy energy lines along the screen. It's reminiscent of the background you see on Playstation 3 or PSP. The colors, speed and size of the waves can be changed to produce very different effects. Because Wave contains such extensive settings, you can easily set up your device so it's smooth and power efficient. Even at a modest frame rate with the detail level reversed, the Wave may seem impressive, but its higher settings have not caused me any unacceptable battery drainage. The wave costs $1.49 on Google Play, but there's a very free trial. The Maxwell Space Colony Space Colony is the very detailed live wallpaper on this list, but shockingly easy on the battery. This wallpaper narrates a futuristic silhouette covered in glowing fog on your home screen. Get a dozen different funds to choose from from color schemes and lighting effects. The camera slowly slides through the sky and slides through the narrow gaps between the glowing towers, but with a quick double tap on the screen, you can change the camera's path at any time. Even if the frame speed is set quite high, this live wallpaper is almost never detectable battery drainage. For a full raft of settings, you need to drop $1.95 through an in-app purchase.
